Great Men's Love Letters

BECAMIER.

If ever a woman made a fool of a man. Madame Recamier used Benjamin Constant for that purpose. When she returned to Parls from Rome upon the fall of Napoleon, she started her most brilliant salon under the Bourbons. This salon differed widely from its prodecessors. People did not come in to listen to its mistress' wit, but to look at a woman's loveliness. Juflette Recamier sat on her throne to be worshipped and no woman ever found more willing slaves.

The habitues of her rooms were lovers. They did not all die of it but were wounded, one of them said. Among the hords were Chateaubraind, Bernadotte, Canova, Lucien Bonaparte and a score of others, with Benjamin Constant the highest dupe of the lot.

Constant wrote to her often. In November, 1816, in spite of the rebuffs he had received, he penned her this affectionate letter:

"Acknowledge that you were all."

"Acknowledge that you were fully aware of your power and of the magical state of subjection to which you have reduced me, when I asked if you would be at home to any one this evening, and you replied; 'Not to you, at any rate!' Mon dieu! What have I done to be treated like this, and not to have the courage to complain.

Only a month before the above letter was written, on October 2, he wrote as follows: "I cannot live without you, I am about wounded unto death, utterly unable to recover my strength Had I your love I should be death, uttorly unable to recover my strength. Perhaps you think me mad, but I recall your boldness; I repeat to myself your words: I see again that girlish air so full of grace again that girlish again that girli and refinement. I have reason for my madness—I should be made not to do so. At first we tried to talk but we soon didn't have breath for a word and jjust had sense enough to cling to snything that came handy as we tore along, most of the time on two wheels. My hat was over one ear and Nelly's hair was hanging down her back. So I didn't wonder the country people stood still and watched us tear past. They'll have a tradition up there that some witches went by on a broomstick, you see if they don't.

"Then Nelly got to timing us and that was the least cheerful of all, for he was was going as fast as that eld tub could possibly travel and it didn't make us any happier to learn that we were losing the race. Once we thought we were going to be stopped by a town officer, but he let us go on, and though we slowed down a little for him we made it up as soon as we got around the corner. Then something happened and the man had to stop and set out and hammer at the machinery while I ran into a store and bought some awful sandwiches. We ate those things in lumps as we tore along.

"An clder and an eldress are the patriarchal heads of the villages. In the larger villages two of each sex are chosen, and their authority is unquestioned. The recruits of the societies are from world weary persons to whom the isolation appeals, and children attending their schools who are imbued at an impressionable age with their religious teachings. Each member of the community is expected to perform a share of the work, and by work the Shaker means manual and by work the Shaker means manual labor. Many attempts to carry out the economic ideas of the Shaker villages have failed, apparently because the absence of the religious tie allowed members to depart too easily."
